

In this study of identity in Doris Lessings space fiction, David Waterman devotes a chapter to each of the five novels in the Canopus in Argos: Archives series, as well as Briefing for a Descent into Hell, Memoirs of a Survivor and finally The Reason for It. This is an important addition to understanding the works of this prolific author. His major argument is that Lessings space fiction identifies the universal problem - societys division into competitive and predatory groups - and places it outside the bounds of time and space, encouraging a social critique which takes into account our inherited blindness, our degenerative disease which must be addressed before genuine progress can be made. Lessings examination of the relationship between individual identity and group identity produces a productive tension that accounts for so much of interest in her work over many years. Nowhere is that tension more obvious or more interesting than in the space fiction that David Waterman so ably explores. Waterman writes convincingly of Lessings desire to cut through the performance, the received ideas, the habits and customs of our daily lives. Drawing on a wide range of sources, he provides an interdisciplinary reading of the space fiction and maps Lessings brave exploration of the hierarchical landscapes that so often imprison us. Waterman offers a timely reading of Lessing for contemporary readers living in the landscape of globalization. - Professor Margaret Moan Rowe, Purdue University
